My book Full Circle, first published by Chatto and Windus in 1964, described the tactics of air fighting from the beginning of the First World War, when single, fabric-covered aeroplanes scouted for the soldiers below, to the jet fighting of the Korean War.

The Story of Air Fighting brings the reader up to date, and my thanks are due to many fighter pilots who have helped me with information and advice. They include my old friend J. Danforth Browne, his son Chad Browne, Lieutenant Colonel Alton B. Parker, Colonel Ken Cordier and Brigadier General Robin Olds.

I am grateful to Commander Nigel Ward, Wing Commander Peter Squire and the pilots of 1 Squadron, RAF, for their first-hand accounts of the air fighting over the Falkland Islands.

Finally, I am deeply indebted to the Commander of the Israeli Air Force for the excellent briefings at his headquarters and for allowing me to visit his fighter squadrons where I talked with fighter pilots of the most combat-experienced air force in the world.

Highly acclaimed when it appeared as Full Circle twenty years ago, and now brought fully up to date, this outstanding 'human' history by the great World War II fighter pilot, Johnnie Johnson, tells the story of fighting in the air from the First World War to the present day.

The author's analysis of aerial strategy is full of thrilling first-hand accounts by legendary aces such as Oswald Boelcke, Manfred von Richthofen, Douglas Bader, Adolf Galland, Werner Mölders, Robin Olds, Don Blackslee . . .

A top-scoring allied fighter of the Second World War, Johnnie Johnson is supremely qualified to write this absorbing account.
